Food, Fascism and Foreign Policy: Anglo-Argentine-United States Relations, 1945-1950 Paul Goodwin
Argentina, a neutral power for most of World War II, nevertheless provided the Allies with thousands of tons of foodstuffs during the conflict. Food was also critical to a hungry post-war Europe. But rise of Juan Perón to power threatened the flow of supplies, because the United States perceived him as a fascist and Nazi sympathizer and determined to prevent his ascension to the presidency even if it destabilized Argentina. The British saw Perón as a typical Latin American strongman, a pragmatist, with whom they could deal, and strongly opposed United States policy. The different policy approaches put severe strains on the so-called "special relationship" between the wartime partners. It is a complex story, as the various actors pursued multiple agendas, at times at cross-purposes. But underneath it all was the need for food.
